Pre-conference Symposium

TITLE: Active Aging and the Built Environment: Health for All

HOST Organization: Simon Fraser University Gerontology Research Centre

DATE: June 8-9, 2007

PLACE: Simon Fraser University Vancouver campus, 515 W. Hastings St, Vancouver, BC

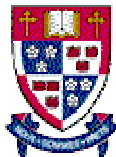

The theme of this 1.5 day symposium recognizes the importance of taking an active approach in meeting the challenges of population aging. It also recognizes the important role that the built environment can play in enhancing the health and well being of today's and tomorrow's older population. Our plan is to explore ways of removing barriers and increasing the age-friendliness of the various settings in which older people spend their time, examine the links between the location and design of housing, shopping, restaurants and service areas, parks and recreational settings and the obesity epidemic that is sweeping the country; and the implications for various sub-groups of the population of increasing the walkability of our communities. One size may not fit all – the World Health Organization's Active Ageing policy framework highlights the need to take culture and gender into account in examining all policies and programs. Current and planned health, housing and lifestyle initiatives targeted to the aging population need to be examined from the perspective of these two cross-cutting variables. We also need to be sensitive to four key planning principles, identified in the BC Ministry of Health's recent symposium on Active Aging, that are important considerations that will guide the development of provincial, regional, and local active aging plans and actions. These are: inclusiveness, evidence, communication, sustainability and leadership. Some "how to's" and "best practices" will be presented as a guide for achieving these goals.
